JOB MARKET PAPER

“It’s More Than Time and Money: How the Parent-Child Relationship Shapes Skill Formation”

Abstract: I study how the parent-child relationship shapes the development of children’s socio-emotional skills. I develop and estimate a dynamic model of household decision-making in which parents allocate time across work, leisure, and active time with the child, and choose how much to spend on the child. These choices build a parent-child bond, which captures emotional warmth and consistency. Investment affects skills mainly through the bond: it builds the bond, which in turn builds skills, while its direct effect on skills is small. I also find that mothers’ active time is the most productive input into investment, followed by fathers’ active time and then expenditures on the child. Counterfactual analysis shows that policies raising family income have little effect on parental investment, although they raise the bond more than they raise skills. Policies that could change how parents value the child’s skills or the relationship, or that directly strengthen the bond, such as school-based or family therapy programs, are more effective at raising socio-emotional skills. These findings place the parent-child bond, rather than investment itself, at the centre of the technology of socio-emotional skill formation.
